The Barbican Estate is a residential estate built during the 1960s and the 1970s in the City of London, in an area once devastated by World War II bombings and today densely populated by financial institutions. It contains, or is adjacent to, the Barbican Arts Centre, the Museum of London, the Guildhall School of Music and Drama, the Barbican public library, the City of London School for Girls and a YMCA (now closed), forming the Barbican Complex. The complex is a prominent example of British Brutalist architecture and is Grade II listed as a whole, with the exception of the late Milton Court. Milton Court once contained a fire station, medical facilities and some flats and was demolished to allow the construction of a new apartment complex which also contains additional facilities for the Guildhall School of Music and Drama.
The estate was built between 1965 and 1976, on a 35-acre (14 ha) site that had been bombed in World War II. The complex was designed by architects Chamberlin, Powell and Bon, whose first work was the ground-breaking Golden Lane Estate immediately north of the Barbican. The estate of 40 acres (16 ha) was officially opened in 1969 and is now home to around 4,000 people living in 2,014 flats. The flats reflect the widespread use in Britain in the 1960s and 1970s of concrete as the visible face of the building.

The estate has been estimated to stand for another 130 years.
The residential estate consists of 13 terrace blocks, grouped around a lake and green squares. The main buildings rise up to seven floors above a podium level, which links all the facilities in the Barbican, providing a pedestrian route above street level. Some maisonettes are built into the podium structure. There is no vehicular access within the estate, but there are some car parks at the periphery of the estate. Public car parks are located within the Barbican Centre. The estate was built between 1965 and 1976 on a 35-acre (14 ha) site that had been bombed in World War II. The complex was designed by architects Chamberlin, Powell and Bon, whose first work was the groundbreaking Golden Lane Estate immediately north of the Barbican. The estate of 40 acres (16 ha) was officially opened in 1969 and is now home to around 4,000 people living in 2,014 flats. The flats reflect the widespread use in Britain in the 1960s and 1970s of concrete as the visible face of the building.

There are currently 2000 residents in the Barbican.
The residential estate consists of 13 terrace blocks grouped around a lake and green squares. The main buildings rise up to seven floors above a podium level which links all the facilities in the Barbican, providing a pedestrian view from the south-side of the Barbican.
The residential estate consists of 13 terrace blocks grouped around lake and greensquares. The main buildings rise up to seven floors above podium level, which links all the facilities in the Barbican, providing a pedestrian view from the south-side of the Barbican.
THE BARBICAN BUILDINGS

Guildhall School of Music and Drama, the Barbican public library, the City of London School for Girls and a YMCA (now closed [1], forming the Barbican Complex. The complex is a prominent example of British brutalist architecture and is Grade II listed as a whole[1] with the exception of the late Milton Court. Milton Court once contained a fire station, medical facilities and some flats and was demolished to allow the construction of a new apartment complex which also contains additional facilities for the Guildhall School of Music and Drama.

YMCA (now closed [1], forming the Barbican Complex. The complex is a prominent example of British brutalist architecture and is Grade II listed as a whole[1] with the exception of the late Milton Court. Milton Court once contained a fire station,
The Barbican Estate is a residential estate built during the 1960s and the 1970s in the City of London, in an area once devastated by World War II bombings and today densely populated by financial institutions. It contains, or is adjacent to, the Barbican Arts Centre, the Museum of London, the Guildhall School of Music and Drama, the Barbican public library, the City of London School for Girls and a YMCA (now closed) forming the Barbican Complex. The complex is a prominent example of British brutalist architecture and is Grade II listed as a whole with the exception of the late Milton Court. Milton Court once contained a fire.

YMCA (now closed) forming the Barbican Complex. The complex is a prominent example of British brutalist architecture and is Grade II listed as a whole with the exception of the late Milton Court. Milton Court once contained a fire.

Barbican Estate
Central London,
Barbican Underground
SHAKESPEARE TOWER, BARBICAN

COW ROCK, ILKLEY